Get rid of sea slugs and keep all their heads and bodies! That's some tricks from the regular ocean. Scientists have recently discovered this 4.5-millimeter-long organism can accomplish a yet example of being able to regenerate after being severed. Most forms of animal regeneration — repairing damaged or lost body parts with de novo tissue replacement — occur after birth, but in slugs it's possible to regenerate and must be happen. But there was also, which belongs to a group called leeches, can take it to the next level by regrowing an entirely new body from just their heads, which then seem to be able to detach from their original bodies for purposes.
